Analysis: Took us many to realise this is indeed the same director and same writers of the Mughal-e-Azam. It is impossible to ignore the message it sends when one sees on the trailer that Ali asks if he can be bought over and that's when we realise it is indeed the same movie. After the effects of seeing Mughal-e-Azam in theaters, when you see it on the big screen, it is nothing short of amazing. The visuals are incredible. The soundtrack is a mind blowing mix of new sounds and old. There is a certain grandeur to the entire film and you find yourself glued to the screen the entire time. The way the characters are portrayed is a lesson to all filmmakers. You have a baddie, a good guy and the rest is pretty standard. It is the consistency and combination of those three, which makes up this work of art. The performances are stellar. Each actor in the film delivers in the space of what you would normally expect of him. The actors of Mughal-e-Azam live on in this film too. The chemistry between all of them is great. The script is not just its strength, the script is what makes it the most quotable film of the year. The dialogue and narration leave a mark. The most crucial of all is that it shows how low the level of filmmaking has reached when these 3 films take place. This doesn't mean that we shouldn't applaud them but it should make you want to give a reminder to all those filmmakers out there. Review: As expected, a huge bang on the first full day of the Indian Cinema 2013, PK is a very entertaining film. It's a rare thing to say, that's for sure. The film starts with a black screen. Then the credits begin and the first line that is spoken is "It's May 27". You wait for almost 20 minutes for the first scene, and then we are introduced to the protagonist, one Raja Goswami. As a first timer, I don't know how to comment on the film. I feel that at the end of the day it depends on your taste. It is a film that is either liked or disliked. Talking about Raja Goswami, he is a top class performance by the entire cast. I feel that the Hindi Film industry as a whole has taken a bit of a dive 82157476af
